

JOHN HARVARD'S JOURNAL

Exterior construction of the Laboratory for Integrated Science and Engineering nears completion in this view from Oxford Street in Cambridge; occupancy is scheduled for next summer. The physical-sciences facility, one of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences' largest investments, includes below-grade clean rooms for nanoscale research (see September-October 2005, pages 54-55, for a crane-top view of the excavation). A new courtyard—the roof of the underground laboratories—will ultimately connect the quadrangle formed by the rising tower, the Music Building, the Science Center, and McKay Laboratory.

Photograph by Jim Harrison

Reprinted from Harvard Magazine. For more information, contact Harvard Magazine at 617-495-5746.